Introduction

The fashion industry is fast-paced and ever-changing, and brands that fail to adapt quickly risk losing relevance. Superdry is a case in point: once at its peak a decade ago, the brand now faces serious challenges, including declining demand and a potential emergency sale in 2024 (Ceron, 2024). Despite a distinctive identity blending British roots with Americana and Japanese aesthetics, Superdry has struggled to stay aligned with Gen Z trends, its primary target audience. CEO Julian Dunkerton's rejected restructuring plan has left the company in a fragile position. While Superdry maintains a strong retail presence in the UK and positions itself as a sustainability leader in official reports, these messages often fail to resonate with consumers. This report focuses on the UK market and explores how Superdry can rebuild brand relevance through improved design strategy, clearer communication, and better alignment with current fashion and cultural shifts, particularly to reconnect with younger consumers.

Core Categories

Clothing

Superdry has many different clothing lines with many different products within these collections. Clothing includes: jackets/coats, hoodies, sweatshirts, graphic tees, cargos etc. Their wide approach highlights how there product range is designed to put “the right products in front of the right customers” (Superdry Annual Report, 2021). As listed below are some of these clothing lines + examples.

Along with clothing, Superdry does footwear and accessories. Their footwear includes casual trainers, boots and vegan sneakers. This is important as it is in line with the brand’s mission statement, “to be the #1 Premium Sustainable Style Destination” (Superdry, 2023). Since 2021, Superdry has shifted to 100% vegan trainers, which goes well with the rise of sustainability concerns formed during the pandemic (Parker, 2024). Superdry’s accessories include bags, hats, sunglasses and even fragrances.

- Jackets continue to be well received on the whole regardless of gender.

Symbols/Packaging

- Black and Orange colour scheme

- Introduced in 2020-21
- Fully recyclable bags
- 100% FSC certified

Price

Strategy

Superdry positions itself in the mid-market segment, not the cheapest nor the most expensive. It does this to reflect both to reflect style and substance, but not enter full luxury. Its motivation to become the “#1 Premium Sustainable Style Destination” also dictates its pricing. Its ethical and sustainable production with quality materials forces its price to sit where it does.

Superdry CEO, Julian Dunkerton, wants the brand’s image to be that of value and quality over lower pricing.

Challenges

- The UK cost-of-living crisis (2023-2025) has made the UK population highly price-sensitive; Customers are more likely to wait for discounts.
- Their best-performing clothing is outerwear; this can lead to downturns in off-seasons like summer.

Place

Channels

Superdry uses a multi-channel strategy. These include:

- Flagship and branded retail stores
- Online store (Superdry.com)
- Third-party e-commerce platforms (e.g. ASOS, Zalando)
- Wholesale channels

Of their channels, their most effective in terms of revenue is according to their 2024 Financial Statements (Superdry, 2024).

1. Retail stores £371.6 million
2. Online stores £225.6 million
3. Wholesale £117.0 million

However, despite this, all channels have been down since the 2023 financial year.

Store Experience

As of 2025, Superdry maintains 85 stores in the UK, with most major cities in the UK possessing at least one store (ScrapeHero, 2021). However, at the same time, Superdry has been slowly declining in the number of stores in the UK. Their main flagship store is on Regent Street in London.

The store's design and concept takes large inspiration of both vintage American and Japanese aesthetics. This is in tune with Superdry's USP of "vintage Americana and Japanese-inspired graphics with a British style".

Promotion

Marketing Communication Strategies

Influencer Marketing

- As of 2025, Superdry has stepped up their influencer marketing. Collaborating with SocialHit to interact with younger audiences through TikTok. SocialHit allows them to utilise more micro-influencers. The result is over 117 million impressions (SocialHit, 2025).
- Superdry has also leveraged macro-influencers, such as when Superdry began utilising larger names in influencer marketing, notably partnering with Neymar Jr in 2021 to launch and promote its shift toward sustainability.

Collaborations

- As mentioned in the Products section, Superdry X provides Superdry a tool to collaborate with other brands and artists. This can come in the form of other companies such as Komodo with their ethical capsule collection and celebrity collaborations such as their Zara Larsson "Icons of Style" campaign in 2020 (Roberts, 2020).

Social Media Usage

- Superdry's target audience is younger, so they are avid utilizers of social media to connect with them
- Their platforms include:
 - o Instagram, TikTok and YouTube
- While they do have a presence on these apps they are highly underutilised and do not get much attention.

Sustainability Messaging

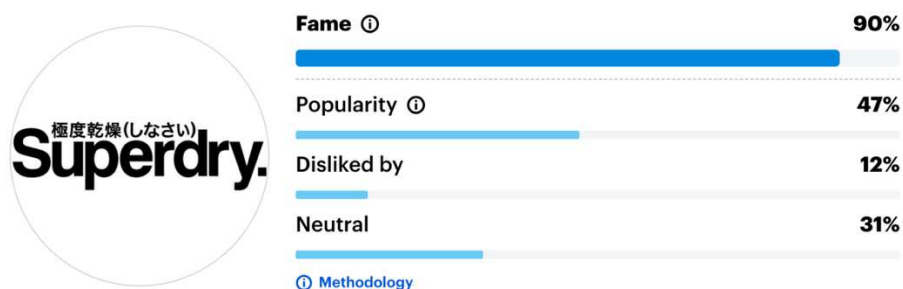

- Sustainability is a core goal of Superdry, and it has been for over 5 years.
- In 2023, they launched their Better Choices Better Future campaign. The first consumer-facing campaign done by Superdry to bring awareness to Superdry's environmental commitments.

Brand Exploratory

Brand Salience

Awareness of Superdry is relatively high due to its common high street retail stores and its peak popularity in the early 2010s.

According to YouGov (2025), the “fame” of the brand in the UK is at 90%, which is the 31st most in the UK for Fashion & Clothing Brands. However, the brand’s fame is also in decline.

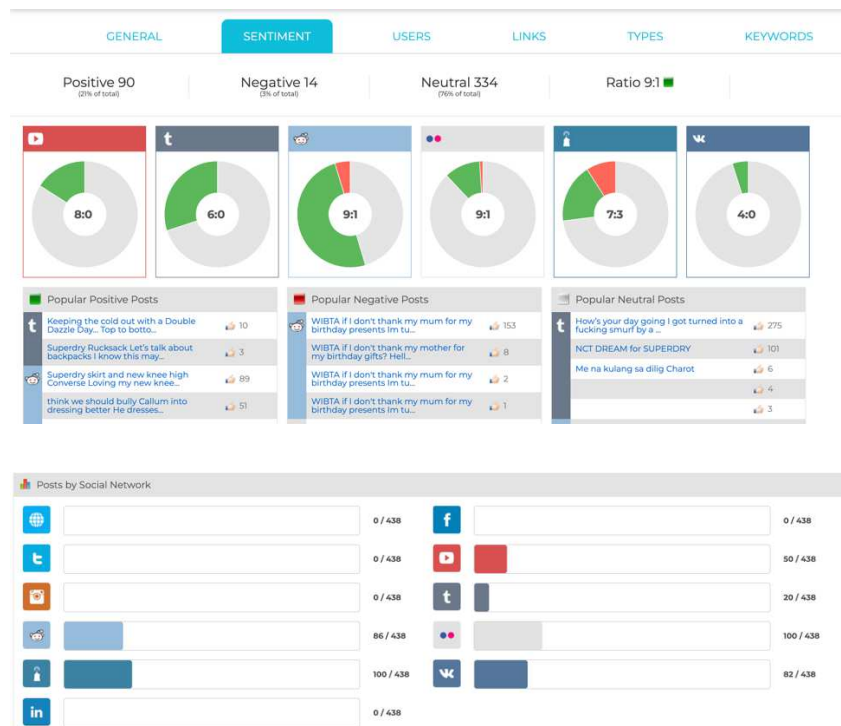

Brand Image

- The Brand is perceived as a “premium high street” brand. Which has only gone against itself as GlobalData apparel analyst Pippa Stephens believes that the prices “might have hit disproportionately during the cost-of-living crisis” (Wright, 2023).
- There is also confusion over the origins of the brand, as Reddit user states, “I’ve never quite got how them being 'Japanese' is supposed to make me feel about their products.” (Reddit, 2022)
- Another problem stemming from the cost-of-living crisis is that the perceived value of Superdry is low at -2.3. For context, the industry-wide Value for Money is 3.0 (Acquiremedia, 2023).
- Their trustworthiness, however, seems to be a strength for the company. Superdry was placed #31 globally in clothing goods according to Newsweek in collaboration with Statista (Cooper, 2024). This statistic looks at the perceived trust in a company from consumers, investors and employees.
- A major problem is that while Superdry is striving for this sustainability angle, it is not perceived as such. Good on You states that while their materials might be sustainable, their labour practices are less so (Rauturier, 2022). It also received a 32/1000 on their Fashion Revolution Transparency Rating, indicating limited public disclosure of their environmental practices (Besma, 2021). Superdry is limited by its status as fast fashion, as it limits its genuine sustainability perception.

- This is enforced by Forbes who critiques Superdry describing them as greenwashing, “brands like Superdry proudly point to the recyclability of their packaging, but that pales in comparison to the carbon footprint of their main product” (Ro, 2021).
- There is also a rising problem with “logo fatigue” that has swamped the fashion industry since the 2020’s with many consumers preferring more minimalist designs. Superdry has maintained its logos in its designs and has had people question if the brand is dated or, as one Reddit user puts it, “tacky” (Reddit, 2024).

Sentiment Analysis

Social Media

Images from <https://www.social-searcher.com/social-buzz/?q5=Superdry> (Social Searcher, 2025)

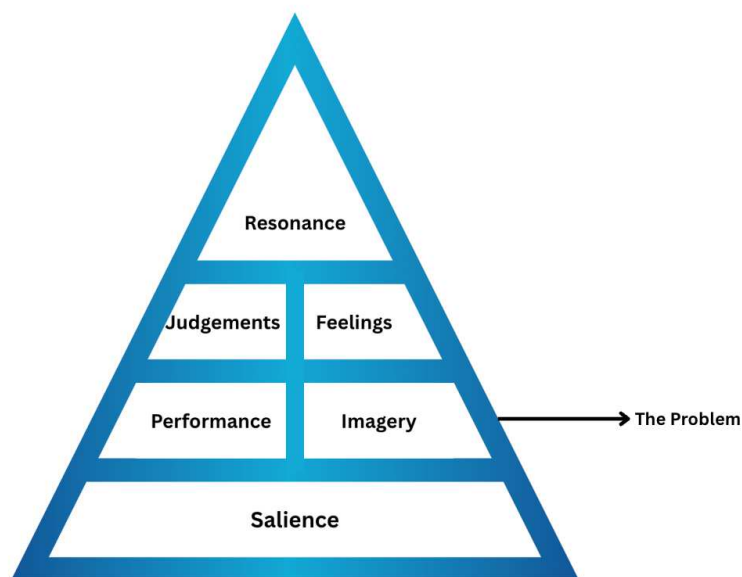

This shows which social media platforms gain the most traction. The best-performing platforms in terms of getting mentions are:

1. Daily Motion
2. VKontakte (a Russian social media platform)
3. Reddit
4. Flickr
5. Youtube
6. Tumblr

- The key takeaway is that Superdry's social mentions are all on rather outdated social media's rather than more modern ones like Twitter (X), Instagram, Facebook, and TikTok. According to Statista (Dixon, 2025), these are the most popular platforms in the UK.
- The sentiment shows us that despite a 9:1 ratio of positive mentions to negative ones. Most are neutral on the company.

Problem Justification

To identify the problem, we will use Keller's Brand Equity Model to see the weakness of Superdry.

- Superdry does not struggle with its salience stage in the UK. This comes from the fact that the brand was especially popular in the early 2010s and its high street locations. As such it does not need help getting recognition.
- The struggle arises in the second layer, dedicated to the meaning of the brand
 - o Performance remains relatively strong. This is because it satisfies customer expectations, shown by its trustworthy status. It meets the needs of the customer.

- Imagery is where the brand especially struggles. It does not do well at appealing to its target audience, whether that is through its confusing identity between British/American/Japanese origins or its inability to promote its sustainability goals
- Due to inconsistent and unclear brand imagery, consumers, especially younger audiences, struggle to form emotional connections with Superdry, which prevents the brand from reaching the resonance stage in the pyramid

Brand Objectives

Objective	Target	Timeframe	Rationale
Increase visibility of brand's sustainable fashion	Raise awareness of sustainability efforts by 50% among 18-30s	6-9 months	Superdry want to be the #1 sustainable fashion brand but their marketing and public perception does not mirror this.
Improve perception of Superdry as fashion-forward brand	Increase positive sentiment and increase mentions on TikTok, Instagram and Twitter.	6 months	The audit showed that the brand has become outdated and this is reflected in the social media platforms where discussion around the brand takes place. It is important to reach younger generations to stay relevant.

Brand Strategy

Proposition

Superdry has a brand image problem. To correct this, it will involve rebranding. The strategy is primarily a visual rebranding effort; however, its goal is to realign the brand with a new brand meaning, hence having strategic intent. The goal of the visual rebrand is to ensure that the new imagery shows the true intent of the brand as a more authentic, sustainable and modern brand.

According to Keller's (2020) revitalisation model, brand image can be improved by enhancing the strength, favourability, and uniqueness of associations. Superdry's current design language, dominated by heavy graphics and non-transparent messaging, undermines its core values of quality and sustainability. In contrast, brands like Pangaia use minimalist design to communicate environmental credibility and material innovation — offering a blueprint for Superdry's visual evolution.

At the heart of the company is a desire for quality goods, with its strengths in jackets like the Afghan jacket. Although Superdry offers high-quality products, its mid-market pricing and cluttered branding dilute perceptions of premium value — making its sustainability claims appear inconsistent or secondary. The result, however, is that their main goal of sustainability is sidelined, and attempts to rectify are seen more as greenwashing. The rebranding's purpose is to push forward sustainability, but also quality. A key example of a company that accomplishes this is Pangaia. The sample below is a key example of the differences between the brands.

PANGAIA

極度乾燥(しなさい)
Superdry®

Pangaia's simple design and logo are done to emphasise their materials. Their clothes are also listed with no logos, except a brief description of where the material is sourced from. Superdry, on the other hand, has a convoluted design which mirrors the convoluted brand image. Both have similar goals, with the environment being the top priority.

New Position Statement

"A forward-looking streetwear brand championing sustainability, self-expression, and urban culture for a new generation."

Visual Rebranding Execution

Clothing

- The move from the full "Superdry" name to the minimalist "SD" aligns with Keller's (2020) observation that brands undergoing revitalisation often adopt initials to modernise and streamline their identity (e.g., "KFC" from "Kentucky Fried Chicken")
- Removal of the obnoxious logo that has plagued Superdry's clothing in recent years

- The use of neutral colours is more reflective of their commitment to sustainability.
- Minimalist design, while it is a reflection of hopping on recent trends as seen by brands like Pangaia or Cos, it also will allow for the pieces to be more timeless. It will also prevent the critique that affected Superdry, which is that it peaked in the 2010s.

Retail Shop Interior Development

- AI Generated Images

Key Points

- The use of white light to reflect natural lighting replaces the dark in the shop's appearance, which Superdry used to have.
- The minimalist design has transferred over from their clothing to the store, with exposed concrete and basic metal clothing racks.
- To support their claim for #1 sustainable clothing brand, information panels displaying fabric origins are located around the store.

Packaging

Replaces the black and orange paper bags with a brown, eco-friendly tote bag designed to be reused rather than thrown away immediately. It is inspired largely by Trader Joe's tote bag, which has become a fashion statement of itself and allows it to constantly be reused.

Cultural and Consumer Alignment

The strategy does not alter Superdry's core target audience but rather realigns its brand expression and touchpoints to better reflect the values and preferences of Gen Z consumers. This demographic increasingly favours ethical consumption, minimalist aesthetics, and brand authenticity. As such, the rebrand involves the removal of loud Japanese symbols and graphic-heavy designs, which had previously obscured the brand's identity. These have been replaced by a more refined, British urban visual identity rooted in subtlety and sustainability.

There is also an attempt to appease McKinsey's Community Flywheel. As shown in the retail shop interior, products will have their story told around them. Hero products like the Afghan jacket or their 100% vegan shoes will remain, but their stories will be more prominent. According to the community flywheel, this will allow for more growth and provide higher returns on investments, but at a lower risk because it will create a more authentic and active community (Ahuja et al., 2022).

Finally, the rebranding effort addresses existing brand avoidance, particularly identity avoidance, as defined by Lee et al. (2009). This form of avoidance occurs when a brand's image is symbolically incongruent with an individual's self-concept. The rebrand, by updating the brand's imagery and aligning it with the values of younger consumers, seeks to reverse this avoidance and rebuild positive brand associations.

Communication Strategy

Purpose

Superdry's rebranding must be supported by a communication strategy that is more fitting for their Gen Z audience. This means to push their communication strategies on platforms more used by the current Gen Z. The communication strategy also needs to show that this rebranding is a complete visual overhaul, so it can overcome the negative stigma that has built up towards the brand. High-impact digital storytelling and influencer engagement will all contribute to removing the "outdated" feeling that Superdry has. In this section, we will outline the strategies that will best convey to consumers that the rebranding has resulted in a realignment with current Gen Z values.

Brand Launch Communication

The brand launch will emphasise the visual rebrand. Due to the large number of Superdry stores around the country, the launch will gain a lot of traction from the retail stores' refurbishment. During this time, there will also be a build-up on social media through Instagram reels and TikTok with work with influencers. This is supported by Keller's (2001) IMC principles that consistency and synergy will drive a stronger overall brand impact.

Message Strategy

Superdry's message strategy will be to demonstrate its realignment with modern values to an audience that is fully aware of its existence. To catch the attention of the UK public, Superdry's visual rebranding of the logo to something more succinct will create a lot of impact. The key themes of the message strategy are sustainability, minimalist identity, and rooted in British urban culture.

Points of Difference

- "Sustainable production (100% recycled and ethical materials)"
- Simpler designs/removal of logo
- Staying true to their British urban roots
- Removal of Japanese influences (contributing to the outdated aesthetic)

Points of Parity

- It will maintain its easily accessible streetwear but elevate it to almost a higher quality.
- Will also maintain its competitive middle-ground pricing
- Their jackets will remain (stylish and functional)

Creative Strategy

The creative strategy's role is to show that the realignment in values isn't just in words, which had been a problem for Superdry previously. To work within an integrated marketing communication plan, the campaign that will begin around the opening of the completely renovated stores will have at its core a creative concept that will operate across all advertising. One of the keys to this consistency throughout different channels is to maintain similar stylist elements:

Element	Creative Direction
Colour palette	Neutral, earthy tones with muted urban contrast — reflects sustainability + fashion.
Typography	Bold sans-serif fonts with minimalism and legibility — clean, modern, and digital-first.
Photography style	Editorial-style street photography, lo-fi textures, wide angles, natural lighting.
Video	Lo-fi short-form (Reels/TikToks), voice-over storytelling, ambient soundscapes.
Iconography	Simplified SD logo, patch-style icons indicating recycled materials or carbon savings.

The in-store experience will also differ with a product's origins listed on the label around it. This is done to create more of a narrative, as well as QR-code-triggered stories that can be found only in the stores. This will lead the consumer to a video of where the inspiration for the product came from, as well as the production process. For example, the Afghan jacket can have a code that leads to its inspiration from Bohemian fashion. This will further deepen the connection between the customer and the product, which will result in greater sales.

Brand Performance & Metrics

To evaluate the success of Superdry's rebrand, the metrics needed will have to be robust. It is also important that it stays true to the fundamental goals, which are to increase the brand's visibility of sustainability as well as improve brand perception. Improvement of these goals will result in revitalising brand relevance, increasing customer engagement and expanding reach with Gen Z customers. So tracking them through metrics will result in overall greater brand performance.

Sustainability Awareness Metrics

To ensure that Superdry is succeeding in its sustainable initiatives, it can conduct frequent brand tracking studies asking people about their awareness of eco-friendly products. The surveys can be done quarterly, which will give Superdry's general management goals on how to improve for the next quarter. This can also be tracked through Google Trends analysis. Superdry might also track share of voice (SOV) in sustainability-related conversations. An increase in SOV focused on sustainability would show an improvement in brand presence in eco-related discourse. Finally, they would also want to track the eco-product sales ratio. While the goal is to have a fully sustainable stock when opening, it would be easier to run sustainable collections and see how they compare their performance with other collections.

Brand Perception and Sentiment Analysis

Tracking consumer sentiment will be decisive in determining the effect of the rebrand. The most important time will be at the start of the campaign, as soon as they launch their newly renovated stores. Listening to consumer opinions will be important in directing the next moves made by Superdry. Sentiment can be measured both qualitatively and quantitatively: for example, through customer reviews on Trustpilot and social media, and via tracking brand sentiment scores using platforms like YouGov and Socialbakers. Furthermore, changes in Net Promoter Score (NPS) and favourability will show the brand's relevance over time.

Social Media Engagement

While not strictly one of the objectives, a problem identified in the audit was that most of Superdry's social mentions happened on outdated social media platforms. Another metric to observe is an increase in mentions on Instagram, TikTok and Facebook. This will demonstrate that Superdry has increased its performance with younger generations like Gen Z.

Conclusion

Superdry faces the challenge of being considered outdated by its target audience, which is supported by its failure to align itself with their current modern values. However, this does provide an opportunity to turn itself around by a grand rebranding that will gain the attention of Gen Z. Their attention will become engagement by Superdry's new commitments to current fashion trends as well as realignment with Gen Z's values and aesthetics. It aims to strengthen the storytelling behind their products, which can help build a lasting community. It will also become more active on platforms better used by their target audience to remain relevant. Their sustainability claims will not just be notes in their annual reports but will have an actual effect on their products. Performance can be measured through their brand perception and sentiment analysis, as well as sales growth within the Gen Z demographic.
